While it's cool seeing the origin of computer organization within the Command-line interface, I am a very visual person and really appreciate how much time is saved through the Graphic User Interface. I'm sure there are more advantages to CLI as your knowledge of it increases, however I just get lost without visual representation and organization of the interface. I assume CLI could be much faster than GUI if you understand what you're doing. For the everyday user GUI offers brainless methods of navigation through code and web design. Most of the files on my computer are videos and photos and I do better remembering imagery rather than words.
